In supplanting the domestic Italian debate on religious pluralism, the ECHR relied on a highly debatable interpretation of the religious freedom provision of the European Convention, using a contentious interpretation of the right to religious freedom as protecting religious minorities at the expense of the widely held view of the Catholic majority.

An important change occurred in when the Lateran pacts were modified. Browse ECHR has surpassed its jurisdictional authority at the expense of national autonomy by enforcing human rights such as religious freedom. With the dissolution of that party—due to broad internal corruption and the interventions of many penal courts throughout Italy—there ceased to be any formal relation between politics and the Catholic faith.
